The Real Molly Brown

The real-life Mrs. Brown around whom "The Unsinkable Molly Brown" spins its tuneful, romantic story, differed only in a few details from the portrait limned by librettist Richard Morris is this major Broadway musical hit. She was indeed a raga-muffin who rose out of a hillybilly's shanty in Hannibal, Mo., by way of a Colorado mining camp's saloon, into wealth and social position, after marrying the famous Leadville Johnny Brown, who made a silver-mine strike of nearly the same value as the Comstock Lode.

The only liberties with her real story that librettist Morris took were in regard to dates. Actually the Molly Tobin who became Mrs. Brown was born in Hannibal, Mo., around 1860, met and married Johnny Brown in Leadville, Colo., in the early eighties, fought and scrabbled for social recognition in Denver on the basis of her husband's wealth in the late eighties and nineties, and was a widow in her mid-fifties when, in 1912, she was shipwrecked in the disastrous sinking of the Titanic, and by sheer determination kept her lifeboat afloat to earn an international sobriquet as "The Unsinkable Molly Brown."

In "The Unsinkable Molly Brown" Molly and her husband meet and marry and besiege Denver society all in the few years preceding that terrible night of April 15, 1912, when the Titanic sank in the north Atlantic. The audience sees her as a young woman still under thirty keeping her lifeboat afloat by outrowing the men in it and forcing them at gunpoint to keep rowing -- this on a voyage home from Europe to rejoin her husband for a "They-live -happily-ever-afterward" ending of the musical.

Until that fateful collision of the Titanic with the iceberg, the real Molly Brown has been strictly a Denver phenomenon -- a woman snubbed by established matrons of society despite her fabulous wealth, because she was "impossible." The town's established families continually buzzed with tales of her pushiness and vulgarity, and with the unanimous decision of social leaders to exclude her from their homes and their lives -- despite her having bought her way into aristrocratic (and parasitic) circles of Europe.

But Mrs. Brown stopped being merely a local gossip-item in Denver and became a famous international figure through having been aboard the Titanic on its ill-fated voyage, and through her dogged refusal to sink with it.

The widely reported stories about that shipwreck that startled the quiet-pre-war world, all featured the tale of how one of the lifeboats was kept afloat through the gritty determination of one of its occupants. Mrs. Brown, in an evening dress and a fur coat, took authoritarian charge of the boat tossing on the dank, cold, dark Atlantic, and by sheer bluster and habit of command made the men in the boat keep rowing no matter how their hands blistered and bled, until they were picked up by a rescuing ship.

She thereby saved the lives of 39 other persons in addition to her own. The newspaper reports flashing round the world, celebrating her heroism, all called her "The Unsinkable Molly Brown." Denver society people, who tried to sink her for 25 years, and knew of her dauntless determination, were agreed that the sobriquet was just.

Her legend has continued in Denver to this day. Gene Fowler brought it back to vivid national attention in his recollections of his newspapering days in Denver, "Timberline." Two memorials to the fabulously-fortuned Browns remain in Denver today -- the Brown Palace Hotel, built by Lead-ville Johnny Brown and still the city's Number One Hotel, and the hugh Brown mansion on Pennsylvania Avenue, become now -- as have so many great mansions of the past in all American cities -- a run-down boarding house.

The Molly Brown legend is still so much alive in Denver that when "The Unsinkable Molly Brown" was sent on tour, following its long-run success in New York, it was booked for a whole week in Denver, which ordinarily is a three-night or four-night stand for shows touring to or from the Pacific Coast. This was clearly not enough, as the whole city excitedly tried to get in to see the show about its fabled Mrs. Brown. After the show played its engagements in California, it was booked to play two more full weeks in Denver on its way back east.

During those two weeks, the show, playing in a big auditorium, sold every available seat. There hadn't been so much excitement in Denver since Molly herself gave her sumptous parties that everybody of consequence took pains not to attend. Grandchildren of the families who had ignored Molly during her battling lifetime called on her at last.
